IOWA: DMU Becomes First Medical School to Require Mental Health Course for Students

January 24, 2020
News Type: Weekly Spark, Weekly Spark News
State: Iowa

Des Moines University (DMU) medical students are learning how to care for people with serious mental illness. In partnership with the National Alliance on Mental Illness, the university developed a course in 2018 to educate future physicians about treating serious mental illness. As part of the course, students hear from a person in recovery about their experience of living with mental illness, and from a loved one of a person with mental illness. According to Professor Lisa Streyfeller, students are learning how to provide “collaborative, comfortable, engaged care.” Following the course’s initial success as an elective, it is now a requirement for all third-year medical students.

Spark Extra! Learn more about effective care and treatment [2].

Links within this resource
[1] https://whotv.com/2020/01/08/dmu-becomes-first-medical-school-to-require-mental-health-course-for-students/